

The build-versus-buy debate has been applied to insurance systems seemingly forever. But the same debate doesn't seem to apply to managed services. Why is that?

Adding to your IT staff might not cost as much as adding or replacing a system ... at least not in the short term. But what about the long term? If you consider salaries, benefits, training, and turnover, the fixed costs of your IT resources may, indeed, be repeating costs. Especially if you don't get the outcomes you want, does that make any sense, let alone business sense?

It Should Be Simple

We know insurance. We understand the day-to-day operations of insurance companies. We know why end-of-day needs to run every day. We know the importance of timely implementations of rate changes. We've been there. We've done that. And we're ready to offer our managed services to you. It's that simple.

Those services include

- Troubleshooting and Support
- Test System Deployments
- Production System Deployments
- Software Setup and Support
- Automated Process Setup and Support
- Third-Party Interface Setup and Support
- Change Control
- System and Process Monitoring.

It Should Be Flexible

Our managed services concentrate on core insurance systems such as policy and claims administration. We can add these services to servers we host in our datacenter or we can provide them for equipment housed on your own premises.

We offer as-needed, pay-as-you-go billing, with no up-front investments. And we'll offer reduced pricing for longer-term commitments.

If you want to serve your policyholders, rather than your systems, call us. We'll make sure your systems are well-managed, no matter where they are.
